Abstract: In opposition to the mother tongue hypothesis, the father tongue hypothesis states that humans tend to speak their fathers' language, based on a stronger correlation of languages to paternal lineages (Y-chromosome) than to maternal lineages (mitochondria). To reassess these two competing hypotheses, we conducted a genetic-linguistic study of 34 modern Indo-European (IE) populations. In this study, genetic histories of paternal and maternal migrations in these IE populations were elucidated using phylogenetic networks of Y-chromosomal and mitochondrial DNA haplogroups, respectively. Unlike previous studies, we quantitatively characterized the languages based on lexical and phonemic systems separately. We showed that genetic and linguistic distances are significantly correlated with each other and that both are correlated with geographical distances among these populations. However, when controlling for geographical factors, only the correlation between the distances of paternal and lexical characteristics, and between those of maternal and phonemic characteristics, remained. These unbalanced correlations reconciled the two seemingly conflicting hypotheses. [ABSTRACT FROM AUTHOR]

Title of Article: A word-final prop-vowel in colloquial Latin ?

Title of Publication: Glotta: Zeitschrift für Griechische und Lateinische Sprache [\[View journal profile\]](#)

Volume (year) pages: 79 (2003) 23-28

Language: English

ISSN/ISBN: 0017-1298

Abstract: Spellings like « este » or « potesti » in Latin inscriptions reflect colloquial pronunciations with a prop-vowel added to the end of the word. It is inconceivable that « potesti » is an archaism. There is also no reason for believing the spelling to have been influenced by Greek ἐστί.

Abstract: Dopo alcune riflessioni sui metodi atti a identificare similitudini banali, eredità indoeuropee e prodotti del contatto tra l'Anatolia e la tradizione esametrica greca, si esamina l'espressione omerica riferita al soliloquio πρὸς ὄν (μεγαλήτορα) θυμὸν εἰπῆν « parlare al proprio cuore » e si suggerisce un confronto con due locuzioni ittite allo scopo di verificare se le similitudini riscontrate tra queste locuzioni possano essere il risultato di un contatto areale.
